The hypothesis of this project is that blood in the tumors has a lower index of absorbance than blood in the normal colon, and can therefore be selectively removed by laser energy. The specific aim of the project is to design and construct a new laser system capable of delivering a tightly focused beam of laser energy with a good safety margin into the tissue. The basis for this design is the use of diode lasers. A number of medical applications are being investigated using this approach, including the treatment of Barrett's esophagus, colon polyps, and cancerous tissue from different organs, including the colon, stomach, and rectum. The proposed research will extend the time interval between laser treatments and increase the duration of treatment, which would allow a single treatment session to remove cancerous tissue. The safety margin of the therapy will be determined. An important component of the proposed research is the development of a novel catheter to allow the access of laser energy into the tissue.
