Monitoring the risk of deep vein thrombosis in ambulatory patients with cancer. Fifty-three ambulatory patients with cancer were evaluated for the incidence of venous thromboembolic disease (VTE). The cancer patients were matched with 41 age-, sex-, and race-matched controls to assess the incidence of VTE in cancer patients. Patients with lung cancer and those receiving chemotherapy were evaluated separately. Between 30 and 60% of ambulatory patients with cancer treated with alkylating agents have developed VTE. The risk of developing VTE rises from 0.5% to 1.2% to 27% after 50 days of chemotherapy in the first 3 weeks ba244e880a
