Leading researchers - including the Nobel laureate Peter Agre - have called for the creation of a scientific body to oversee nanotechnology, part of a wider research programme to clarify its safety and impacts. The group said the creation of a consortium, backed by governments, could ensure a balance of commercial and non-commercial goals, which research until now has lacked. Nanotechnology is the manipulation of matter at the nanometre (one billionth of a metre) scale, and has already been used for a variety of technological applications, from producing more powerful batteries to preventing damage to the human body in drugs and cosmetics. A report from the US National Academy of Sciences, released at a conference held at the University of California, San Diego, last week, revealed that almost 200 scientific papers on nanotechnology were published in 2005 - a rise of 50% on the previous year. However, it noted that there was uncertainty about the safety implications of some new uses of nanotechnology and said there had been insufficient research on long-term impacts. But the report urged researchers to look beyond the applications, "taking a fresh view of nanotechnology" and to identify "safety and environmental benefits" that could provide "long-term public and regulatory support for pursuing research in this area". Nanotechnology has been criticised for its potential to create nanostructured materials that could have serious environmental impacts, which have been difficult to assess. The report did not elaborate on how the consortium could work, although previous research has suggested a model in which industry and government would fund and supervise the research. Despite these concerns, the academic conference heard that many people involved in nanotechnology were either enthusiastic about its potential applications, or at least acknowledged its challenges. There was also a consensus among the experts that nanotechnology had to be designed carefully to minimise risks and to ensure its long-term safety and usefulness. ¹
