of getting sick again, and it could cost him or her years in the ICU. A few patients may become so sick, and their transplants so difficult to retrieve, that they die on the operating table. Most recipients, however, don't receive bad immune cells, and their transplants only need to be thought about every so often—at least once a year. But some recipients rarely call their transplant doctors, and they never check their blood or visit their eye doctor, like Mrs. D. Mrs. D was a long-term survivor, like all good transplants. The immune cells inside her bone marrow never made her sick. She never developed kidney disease, and she never needed dialysis. So it didn't surprise her doctor when she told him that her last visit was five years before. But he was surprised by the other thing she said: She told him she wasn't a pretransplant patient. Mrs. D's transplant date coincided with a time when the transplant centers focused on improving survival rates after the initial transplant. They paid less attention to patients who had many years of transplant experience. Mrs. D was only interested in the future, not in the past. Fortunately, as Mrs. D's blood failed to show signs of rejection, she didn't need as much follow
