1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an image display device, and more particularly to an image display device that is capable of reading out an image signal supplied from an external image signal generating device.

2. Description of the Related Art In a conventional image display device, as a reading out method of an image signal, an input of a system clock signal is required to scan the image signal line-by-line. To achieve this, Japanese Patent Application Laid-Open No. Hei 7-96486 proposes a configuration in which a synchronous signal supplied from a scanning start synchronous signal generator is input to a scanning signal generator. However, the synchronous signal has to be supplied from the outside of the image display device, and also the synchronous signal has to be used as a system clock signal for reading out the image signal. Therefore, the image display device requires an external synchronous signal supply circuit and external receiving circuit, which leads to a problem of increase in cost.
