Gallium-protoporphyrin-IX Gallium-protoporphyrin-IX (IPIX) is a molecule which is used as a hypoxia imaging agent. It is a protoporphyrin

IX derivative of gallium. Preparation and chemistry Protoporphyrin IX is one of the last components of heme, the active site of hemoproteins and the pigment in all hemoglobin-based red blood cells. The chemical nature of the protoporphyrin IX is essentially similar to the porphyrin molecule, but one of the pyrrole nitrogens is replaced by the gallium atom. The resulting gallium-protoporphyrin-IX can be prepared in a number of ways, and is not necessarily stable.

However, like other gallium-porphyrin compounds, gallium-protoporphyrin-IX tends to remain in the ground state as the first excited state is a single-exciton state, and it is converted only slowly to the ground state. The compound is very soluble in solvents such as chloroform and DMSO. Application The molecule is particularly useful for determining the degree of hypoxia in solid tumors, since it is the photochemical quenching of its fluorescence when excited by near-infrared light that allows this measurement to be carried out. Thus, tumors which exhibit high levels of hypoxia will fluoresce at lower wavelengths (red light) while the surrounding tissue fluoresces at higher wavelengths. Gallium-protoporphyrin-IX is normally administered intravenously, and is converted to the metabolically active photosensitizer agent, gallium-protoporphyrin-IX-monomethyl ester, in the body.
