This invention relates to a polyvinyl alcohol copolymer foam having reduced compression set and moisture sensitivity. This invention also relates to a method for reducing compression set of a foamed, polyvinyl alcohol copolymer. It is known in the art to foam polyvinyl alcohol as a packaging material for products in which the ability of the foam to withstand compression force is important. When heat is applied to a polyvinyl alcohol foam during manufacture, it may be rendered so brittle that it fails prematurely in use, yielding a possible safety hazard. More recently, polyvinyl alcohols have been used as a component of adhesive tape formulations. In some cases, the polyvinyl alcohol serves as both the adhesive and the foam. The vinyl alcohol monomer and polymers derived therefrom are known to possess strong chemical bonds and, therefore, are relatively immiscible with other monomers. For the polyvinyl alcohols to be useful in a significant number of applications, the foam must possess good resistance to compression set. Certain amino-functionalized polymers, in which the amino-functional group is covalently bonded to a polymer, have been used to strengthen polyvinyl alcohols. Recently, cyano-functional polymers

Although packaging of pharmaceutical products in containers, such as bottles and jars, is commonplace and has become a standard part of the operation of most drug retailers, it is nevertheless an expensive component of the overall system. Several strategies have been used to reduce the costs associated with packaging of pharmaceutical products. For example, double-chamber systems have been developed which make it possible to dispense a first dosage of a pharmaceutical product from one chamber of a container and then dispense a second dosage of the pharmaceutical product from a second chamber of the container without any change in the container. Double-chamber containers, however, do not have a convenient means for indicating that both chambers of the container have been emptied. Additional features, such as a volumetric dosing means or other features designed to reduce or eliminate the need to measure liquid, are useful in the selection of certain pharmaceutical products. Additionally, features which facilitate the implementation of sterilization, and thus reduce the number of steps required to dispense and package pharmaceutical products are preferred. One significant problem with existing double-chamber containers is that they are designed to accommodate a single dosage of a pharmaceutical product. As a result, once one chamber of the container has been emptied, either the remaining product must be discarded or the container must be repackaged with a full dose, such as by adding more product to the empty chamber. A disadvantage to such a strategy is the additional cost and inconvenience involved in the repackaging process. For these reasons, a need remains for an improved double-chamber container and method for providing two different doses of a pharmaceutical product from the same container. The present invention is addressed to these needs.
