Photoshop's complicated system of layers and combined mask effects give the program a learning curve that even experienced image editors can find difficult to navigate. In fact, many people new to the program will find Photoshop so confusing that they give up on the software all together and either look for other image editing options or stick with simpler programs. Adobe Photoshop's blending modes and in-program help screen are considered best practice and have been included in every version of Photoshop since release seven, or version CS2. This chapter shows you how to work in this way as an end user. When learning Photoshop, you must first know that the terms layer, layer mask, and blend mode are all used more or less interchangeably. The following sections offer definitions and explanations of what each of these terms mean in relation to the image you're working on. You can use Photoshop to develop and manipulate raster-based images, but for the most part, many professionals and web designers are now more interested in vector-based image editing. The benefits of using vectors make them the best choice for the future of the web as a whole, and image-editing programs have adapted and changed to reflect these advantages. Working with Layers A _layer_ in Photoshop is simply a collection of existing and new graphics elements that form a single container for the content you create. Layers can be manipulated as one combined unit to give the image depth and complexity. To add a layer to a document, follow these steps: 1. Open the image that you want to add to, in either Photoshop or Photoshop Elements. A new layer appears in the Layers palette (see Figure 13-1), and a dialog box appears. 2. Click OK to insert the new layer in the image. 3. Create the new graphics elements. For information on the tools that are included in Photoshop, see the "Selecting and Creating Tools" section later in the chapter. Figure 13-1: Layers are the building blocks of Photoshop. Photoshop also includes a few built-in preloaded layers: Picture, Background, Gradient, and Mask. These layers can be used as a starting point for creating unique layers of your own. Creating, Merging, and Splitting Layers As explained in the previous section, working with layers is a common practice for image editing and design; however, some of the features that make Photoshop so powerful may

Q: Accessing/Changing Document Properties in ASP.NET MVC I have been trying to use HtmlHelpers to get an idea on how to do this. I was thinking if there is anyway to get the properties and values from the DocumentViewModel in the document. I'm guessing the document is stored in a document library. The solution I have is to have the document URL as a hidden field in a form and then store the document (and its properties) in a class that generates a new URL for the document when it is returned. This is the code: `var document = Document.GetDocument(item.StorageID, item.SiteID); public static HttpPostedFileBase FileUpload(this Document document) { return document.File; } public static Document CreateNewDocument(this Document document, DocumentViewModel viewModel) { var url = document.Url; return Document.CreateDocument(document.StorageID, document.DocumentType, document.Title, document.Author, document.Modified, url, viewModel); }` This isn't what I want but I'm trying to get there. How do I get to these properties and the values for them? Can I get to them using

Q: Hiding a button on my form I am making a website which runs off Access files. I have built the database for the website and have a nice and friendly interface. I can link to other databases, files and reports however I want to hide certain things from the users. For example, if the user is an admin and doesn't have administrative rights, I don't want them to be able to delete these reports, however if I have left it disabled they can still view them. Would it be possible to hide the button from the user? A: I could be misunderstanding the question, but would it not be much simpler to just make the admin button more prominent? That way, it becomes readily apparent that what they have access to is not quite the same as what you have access to. Some ways to do this: Place two buttons on the form. One that says "Administrator" and one that says "User" or "Non-Admin". Depending on what data you need to have displayed on your report, you might want to put both the Administrator and Non-Admin buttons on the report. Having the two separate buttons should make it clear for the user what data is available and which data is not. Have a "need-to-know" sub-database with the data that is only available to admins, and another sub-database with the data that is only available to users. These can be linked with a simple query such as: `Select * from masterdatabase.dbo.need_to_know Left Join admindatabase.dbo.need_to_know on need_to_know.some_id = admindatabase.dbo.need_to_know.some_id where admindatabase.dbo.need_to_know.some_field = some_field Select * from masterdatabase.dbo.need_to_know Left Join regulardatabase.dbo.need_to_know on need_to_know.some_id = regulardatabase.dbo.need_to_know.some_id where regulardatabase.dbo.need_to_know.some_field = some_field` You could also use the user's credentials to determine what the data is they can see. If you're using Windows authentication, that should be something like: `SELECT * from`
