The Real Deal: Real-life data The goal in addition to a better-fleshed-out formula is to represent a more accurate version of the game. “You get that sense from EA Sports’ FIFA franchise that they’re looking very closely at the players’ movements,” says EA Sports senior producer Paul Papson. “The idea that we’re integrating biomechanical data makes it feel like it’s more authentic and more accurate for the sport.” As an example, FIFA 20 introduced an expanded Pressure system that can simulate the effect of placing a player on the edge of the tactical area for one player. This led to some under-the-hood changes in FIFA 22, including how players can be pushed into a penalty area. “You will now more accurately represent how a player would fall over in a tackle if they were pushed over by the opposition and it will affect the man-to-man marking and how your opponent reacts,” Papson says. The ability to accelerate the engine to a higher speed means that players are going to hit the ground in a different way. You will feel it in an impact in a more believable way. Goods at soccer meets the latest in game development There are new animations for goalkeepers, as well as a real-time response system that allows for better goalkeeper movement and anticipation. For defenders, the new Edge Control system demonstrates tighter, more accurate counterplay and acceleration in coverage. The Dynamic Attention system provides more robust collision detection, including in off-the-ball movement, and the Edge Smart Guide shows how a defender can control a passing lane that a player tries to exploit. The league’s leading teams, along with the top players, were among those that signed on for the motion capture suit trials, which were conducted in December 2018. Players were filmed at a variety of tasks, with the goal of simulating the movements of high-energy football in higher-level situations. “From a game design standpoint, we’ve actually incorporated the player motion data into a couple areas of the game,” Papsen says. “One example is in the man-to-man marking and the defending of offsides. Some of the issues we saw in the past were that offsides was really inaccurate in terms of how a defender reacts and how you would understand why an offside
