Although there are always tragic accidents, the safety record for the rail transportation industry is remarkably strong. However, railroads, transit authorities, and public transit agencies are nevertheless concerned about reports of persons placing hand-held, personal, loose objects – such as keys, wallets, pens, and the like – on the rails, and then seeing those objects suddenly picked up and transported by rail trains. These are not major incidents. However, they are a widespread concern with transit agencies, and it would be nice to have a solution for this growing safety issue. A number of methods for addressing this problem have been considered. A number of methods for addressing this problem have been considered. These include the following: Traditionally, a railroad often uses short-term track power to activate emergency brakes. There are also safety devices that can be applied to railroad switch stands, as well as other railroad equipment and structures that can be operated to trip an emergency brake. As railroads have increasingly used positive train control (PTC), more systems can be applied to trigger an emergency brake. PTC systems are installed on locomotives and can also be installed on railroad stations and yards. The PTC systems can be operated to cause an emergency brake application to be triggered for a moving railroad train. These systems were installed on all Class 1 railroads in late 2015. Railroads also use intelligent freight containers. These can be equipped with sensors that detect weight sensors and proximity sensors at different locations on the container. When someone places a hand or object on the container, the sensors can be activated to start a process to stop the train. As railroads have increasingly used Positive Train Control (PTC), more systems can be applied to trigger an emergency brake application to be triggered for a moving railroad train. A rail transit agency, such as the New York City Transit Authority (NYCTA), can use a device to be applied to a train system's points, switches, or gates to cause an emergency brake application to be triggered for a moving railroad train. The ALTA (the American Law Institute) is working on a new project to address this issue. The project is known as the Law for Rail Innovation (LiRi). The LiRi project is aimed at developing a model "safety code" for the rail industry. The code would, for example, require the use of rail handholds or designated rail areas at railroad and public transportation terminals. It would also provide

Q: Is there any difference between "could" and "may"? Is there any difference between "could" and "may"? In my native language (Indonesian) they both mean "permissibly" although Indonesian grammar has a word "dapat" which means "can". A: Both words have same meaning, and they have the same grammatical nuances, also. I will make a distinction for two reasons: In formal setting, may is more often than could. may can be used as intransitive verb while could must be transitive. Please note in informal written and spoken language, you may use "can" interchangeably with "may" but the nuance and formality still be preserved. Please see this reference: Q: Accessing value of static class member from inside a static class I have a static class I'd like to access a value from inside. I'm using (and tested with) this for a unit test class since I'd like to use a test class in multiple tests. From inside the class, I want to access a member of the class that should always have a value of 5. I'm trying to access it like this, but I'm getting an error: Error 16 Error 1 'UnitTest.UnitTest' does not contain a definition for 'GetSuccess' and no extension method 'GetSuccess' accepting a first argument of type 'UnitTest.UnitTest' could be found (are you missing a using directive or an assembly reference?) public static class UnitTest { public static int GetSuccess() { return 5; } public static int MyMethod() { return GetSuccess(); } } public class MyClass { public static int MyOtherMethod(int input) { return MyClass.GetSuccess() + input; } } A: This is because you are using C#
