Sens. Lamar Alexander, R-Tenn., and Patty Murray, D-Wash., released a draft of a bill Monday that they hope will be sent to the full Senate after being marked up by the HELP Committee Wednesday. Republicans and Democrats on the committee have been at odds for weeks over whether student loan borrowers should pay more of their costs. Republicans want to use tax revenue to pay for the plan. Democrats think it would mean a hike in taxes. The bill is more of a middle ground. Democrats would guarantee students $6 billion in federal dollars. The dollars would be used to reduce interest rates on loans. The bill would prevent borrowers from receiving federal subsidies to cover most of their college costs, which is only available to families with income under about $160,000. Murray released a statement after the committee markup, saying she was opposed to the measure. "The proposed provision would eliminate government-backed student loans, which are among the most widely-available and useful financial products in American history," Murray said. "It's an open secret that many students are encouraged to take out student loans so they can pay for school." The draft is sure to spark a fiery debate. Murray made it clear that the money Democrats are offering would be backstopped
