Metabolism, cellular localization, and pharmacokinetics of remantadine [100 mg/(kg day)] and its human [75 mg/(kg day)] and marmoset [75 mg/(kg day)] analogues in rhesus monkey, rat, and human. Although the direct antiviral activity of remantadine [100 mg/(kg day)] (R100) against influenza virus in vivo is well documented, its pharmacokinetic and toxicological parameters are not fully defined. To assess these parameters, rat, human, and rhesus monkey were treated with R100 (75 mg/(kg day)), its human (H75) and marmoset (M75) analogues, and with vehicle (controls). The metabolism, pharmacokinetics, and tissue distribution of R100 and its analogues were characterized. Approximately 25% of a single oral dose of R100 was excreted in urine as the desethyl R100 (dR100) and N-desmethyl R100 metabolites. The half-life of R100 and H75 was 3.5 and 2.5 h, respectively. The bioavailabilities of H75 and M75, respectively, were 67 and 46%. The metabolites in plasma at 24 h after treatment were dR100, M100, M101 (the major metabolite), and M102, with M102 being the most abundant. The metabolites in bile were dR100 and M102. H75 and M75 were very well absorbed with similar plasma pharmacokinetics. The tissue distribution of R100 in monkeys was similar to that in rats and humans, but with slightly greater brain concentrations of R100. The tissue distribution of H75 and M75 was similar to that of R100. The organ/tissue concentrations of R100 were similar in human and rhesus monkeys. The systemic availability of the R100 and its analogues was higher in rhesus monkey than in rat. In conclusion, the rhesus monkey is a suitable surrogate for the clinical phase in phase I studies of R100 and H75. The new Fox A&E series "Manhunt," about Chicago police's "shoot first" interrogation tactics and pursuit of "war on drugs" suspects, attempts to explain why cops in America's police state tend to shoot to kill innocent men (or boys), but what it shows is basically an attempt to distract attention away from the subject of police torture.
